

Jim Pham
Final Reflection
8/22/2006

1. The most important “thing” I learned about the law, ethics, and equity.

The law and the concept of ethics and equity are not new to me. As a matter of fact, I have studied them many times before in schools, current and past employers, and through community service. I understand most or all the school law mentioned in this class, except for the specific information (e.g., judicial reviews, case law, and so on). From the class assignments, I have gained a deeper understanding of how schools are affected by the law. While law and ethics are related, the law varies by state and judicial region. With respect to school law, ethics, and equity, these concepts have allowed me to apply the law with love, compassion, and open-mindedness, ensuring I am fair, reasonable, and equitable. This is pretty much a summary of my ethical framework and what I have learned in this class.

2. How you knew you were learning something significant to your role as an educational leader.

As a child growing up during wartime, a refugee, homeless, and poor, I understand what it feels like to be alone, displaced, and living in poverty. For all these reasons, I have always known that ethical and equitable behaviors develop a person’s overall character — professionalism, attitudes, knowledge, skills, and actions that can affect people's lives. Whether at home, at work, or at school, I have always reminded myself to do the right thing. Now that I have gained a better understanding of the law, I am more mindful of the ethical considerations — fairness, equality, and inequality.

3. How this learning will shape your attitudes and demonstrated behavior as a professional leader.

I work as an adjunct instructor at Ohlone College, but as a schoolteacher, I can say I am a better person and teacher now than before. In addition, I feel that I am more responsible in everything I do- motivated to help others, willing to practice fairness and stand up to social injustice and promote equity. Furthermore, I have noticed a change in my behavior at home; my wife has told me that my behavior is more sensitive to her feelings and that I am willing to listen more.

4. How you will be able to demonstrate your disposition (commitments, motivation) in the areas of law, ethics, and equity.

I can’t comment on this question too much, because I don’t work as an administrator, but I believe that effective and ethical leadership is essential to the success of any organization. Understanding school law is essential to being an administrator (Deskbook, 2006). In addition, an administrator needs to be honest/open in communication, keep promises, share benefits fairly, show respect, and practice reciprocity. I am personally committed to doing everything I can to promote ethics, truth, and equity in my place of employment, and to uphold the law.